ASHEVILLE, N.C. — A proposal that would allow Democrats to win more seats in the U.S. House of Representatives and in the North Carolina Legislature was dead on arrival at the state Capitol on Thursday, one day after it was proposed by liberal activists and three days after President Donald Trump endorsed a Republican candidate in the state. Senate leader Phil Berger has vowed to halt House and Senate redistricting commissions that Democrats say are biased against them and has called efforts to end partisan gerrymandering an attack on the state's right to self-governance. But with a lawsuit filed by the Western North Carolina Green Party challenging the 2016 plan, a growing coalition of activist groups and Democratic candidates, Berger on Wednesday was forced to sign on to a ballot proposal which promises to reduce partisan gerrymandering by giving voters new options. "No one had to make this happen," said Donnie Munger, chair of the Buncombe County Democratic Party. "We took this on because the people of North Carolina deserve to have an honest, fair process for their representation in the Legislature and the U.S. House, something we've always had. And we're hopeful others will continue to stand by us and take action." Democratic legislative leaders, who have the biggest influence on North Carolina's political map-drawing process, argue that their party is unfairly marginalized by the system, but Munger said they've accepted the reality of the GOP-led General Assembly and embraced the new ballot proposal. "They have a big part of this problem in the past. That's why we're trying to fix it," said Munger, referring to "Republicans who have been part of the problem and Democrats who have been part of the problem." Thursday's proposal, which has yet to be written into law, would allow voters to create 15 multi-member districts where they could elect any candidate of their choosing. But it wouldn't let them create single-member districts based on political boundaries — a method where
