The recent blog post by The Economist citing New York City's denial of public funds for the ill-conceived Citi Bike [see this] introduces a few major issues. One issue is that the Citi Bike idea was a major sell job for NY Gov. Cuomo and DOT Commissioner Polly Trottenberg. This apparently did not happen. Did the plan to make all of New York City a "Citi Bike city" go astray? Mayor de Blasio, who promised to be very, very, very clear about his anti-tax stance in the campaign, has been very vague on the issue. What happened to this "very clear" plan? Second, the WSJ article noted that Mayor de Blasio is in trouble. This is probably true. But, the article then fails to acknowledge that it is tough for a mayor to handle complex and controversial issues such as this one. What really matters, it seems to me, is that in spite of the controversy, de Blasio appears to be keeping NY City's sputtering private bike sharing program alive. That is good news. Finally, we have the vice president of the New York City Council, Corey Johnson, saying, "I think that this is both a flawed and politically motivated policy that is going to have a negative impact on the Citi Bike service." If the mayor is in trouble, then we have a very responsible official, Corey Johnson, sticking up for his mayor. As the WSJ said, "It appears Mr. de Blasio remains popular, even among council members." This is gratifying. Bruce E.
