The Service's plan, which was released last December, includes a failure to fulfill its obligation to conserve threatened and endangered species. After the Service reissued its recovery plans for the Northern spotted owl in 2008 and 2012, the agency proposed eliminating federal protection of 21 Oregon counties where spotted owl habitat was located. Those counties were all transferred to Oregon's Department of Fish and Wildlife as part of a settlement for Endangered Species Act violations stemming from the ongoing litigation. But the Service has refused to protect these counties under the Endangered Species Act, and the lawsuit today calls for the agency to rectify this mistake. The lawsuit arises from the agency's proposal to take a "worst-case" approach to the recovery of the northern spotted owl. In December, the Service released its "Plan of Strategic Alternatives for Spotted Owl Conservation." This long-anticipated plan delves into the agency's history of not fulfilling its obligations under the Endangered Species Act to protect species with habitat in federal and state forests. Rather than place the owl in a "care" and "constrain" scenario, as is the agency's standard practice, the plan proposes to focus on moving the owl from its current home in federal forest to a more favorable habitat in the desert. This new, "worst-case" approach reflects a complete failure on the part of the agency to take care of the owl and to protect the owl's habitat. As the lawsuit notes, the Fish and Wildlife Service failed to protect the owl when it was in federal forests, and the agency refused to even consider protecting the owl when it left federal forests for the desert habitat. By comparison, the Service proposes to forego the "care" and "constrain" it should have provided when the owl was in federal forests and to adopt aa67ecbc25
