You can also choose to turn your co-pilot off and be alone in the stars or give him the manual control and see through his eyes. A variety of different difficulty levels with different enemies and ships can be chosen by the player to suit their playing style. Features Customise and upgrade your ship Discover quests throughout space Battle huge monsters in spectacular boss battles Upgrade your weapons, modify your ship and repair it in space Order a quick refuel or an orbital drop Play solo or in co-op mode for maximum horror Unveil the mysteries of a starry galaxy... haunted by an ancient civilization. My first impression was a bit of doubt. I was afraid that this game (and the co-pilot system) would be more a game for those who have problems reading the game's instructions. After all, a lot of directions are in big, written letters and I had to read them over and over before being able to understand it. However, after some trial and error, I managed to craft my ship and got it to me and my co-pilot, the captain - and after I registered at the website, I realised that the whole game was in braille. Well, only the instructions on your ship, but still... I was amazed! Although the instructions in braille are not as huge as they could be, they are still legible and clear. In addition to that, you also have the option of choosing all the ship's parts from a gallery. I wonder who designed those! The co-pilot helps you out with your combat strategy and direction. The first time I played the game, I tried the co-pilot on himself and I was well rewarded by him with some gratifying sounds, which is quite funny. Of course, he didn't speak, but I think those sounds were a good way to express his thoughts and intentions to me. Anyway, I've put him to work since then to help me on the journey. I would definitely recommend this game to anyone who like to enjoy a little horror and sci-fi with their space adventures. Cons: * I am sorry I don't have a negative point about this game. What's new in Haunted Space:

Blog Last week I had a minor brush with an Internet cultural monster: the dimensional self-replicator, aka The RepliCon. A server at the Washington D.C. reception center of my former hosting company, YellowShoes, received an anonymous DDoS attempt that left a number of servers (including our Apache, MySQL, mail, web, and DNS servers) disabled and DNS lookups as well as access to the site and email address (mail.dd.com) unreachable for anywhere from a few hours to a few days, depending on how you measured it. The purpose of a distributed denial of service attack is to make a resource unavailable to its intended or authorized users (such as by causing your system to run out of memory). The unauthorized users usually use spoofed computer addresses. The vistors, hoping to make the vulnerability known and thereby stop the attacks, make reference to the name of the networked host a few times. They also post notes and pictures online and complain on the public Internet message boards and forums. In the process, they often post their addresses or addresses of servers they control, which helps the malicious users to initiate repeated DDoS attacks or drive the site's traffic away from the attacks. After the server began to recover, I noticed that the Anonymous/Lulzsec/EveryDude/Whatever group had made a note of the attack on their web site. Other sites, including Gawker, were also under attack. I tried to investigate what happened -- and found no logs that showed anything but a bunch of randomly-selected IP addresses connecting and disconnecting. I suspect that the attack was one of a series of attacks that lasted less than a minute and were therefore not logged. At any rate, the website was back up within a few hours. A version of the software used to perform a Distributed Denial of Service, or DDoS, attack. By the way, if you are interested in DDoS, you should go to their site. It's a rather neat way to hack into the legitimate messaging and discussion boards of legitimate anti-censorship, pro-Free Speech websites like Indymedia, Indybay, and hackACLU. You could also hack into DNS to drive all your mom's traffic to one site and ruin your mom's day.
