Boris Johnson has been accused of being "hard-hearted" for suggesting food banks were no substitute for a basic income for the poor and unemployed.

A former director of one of the country's leading disability charities accused the mayor of failing to grasp the "injustice of the current system" in claiming charity was the only way to help people in poverty. Simon Jenkins, who was director of commissioning for disability and social care at Norfolk social services, agreed that a basic income - a regular payment which is linked to the cost of living - would provide a "relatively fair" way to help people on low incomes. In an opinion piece for the Mail on Sunday, Mr Jenkins said: "Yet we have recently had the debate about a basic income on the back of a call for corporate tax cuts as a replacement for our publicly funded services. "Those who might win benefits from some such policy are mainly welfare claimants who are not the poorest in society - indeed, they are not even in the bottom half. "What we are talking about is a trial of an idea that never made sense in this context because it did not fully appreciate that the poor are the real victim of not getting the services that were promised to them. "The rich have been able to withdraw all their services, but the poor are stuck with them, paying bills that they can ill afford. So a basic income is an injustice of the current system, a handout which allows people, who currently have nothing to fall back on, to still keep the minimum basic decency standards that were promised to them. "It is not a description of the current system, but an alternative which will only allow the system to become even more unfair. If we really want to be tough, we should take this opportunity to close the gap. If we want the present system to become fairer, basic
